Course Description

This seminar course examines how mass media reflect and resist norms of adulthood and aging. Frequently defined as an endpoint — a biological inevitability, a completion of development, an achievement of maturity — adulthood is neither simple nor static. Media for children and adolescents, for example, often depict adulthood as a paradox: both exciting and boring; free of oversight and burdened by responsibility; the beginning of real life and a kind of death. Students will learn interdisciplinary and multimodal humanistic methods for understanding the mediated history of adulthood. Topics include the emergence of young adulthood as a life stage, a key demographic in consumer culture, and a popular genre; fantasies of nonlinear aging like intergenerational body-swaps, aging backward, and agelessness; quarter-life, midlife, and end-of-life crises; infantilization and other discriminatory exclusions from adulthood; gender and rheterics of proper aging; and failures and refusals to age appropriately, from the man-child to the Golden Girls.
